Law and Lawyers. A late Democratic Review contains an ess on 'The Study and Practice of the Law,' by M D. D. FIELD of the New-York Bar, which is eminently deserving the consideration of the Bar not only but of the public. We extract from it the following criticism on the Moral obligations and relations of the Lawyer to which we would especially draw attention. Mr Fiel well says:

If it be true, as we think we have shown, that the condition of the legal profession is an index of civilization, then its learning, its integrity, it character, are matters of public concernment With this view we propose to inquire how far it now fulfils the true ends of its institution. But let us explain what we consider those ends

We conceive them to be threefold: First. When an opinion is asked, to state the law truly Secondly. When advice is asked, to advis-justice. And thirdly. When cooperation is asked, to assist the right and oppose the wrong.

If there be any further duties devolving on tihis opinion upon a purely legal question, his du y an unsound understanding.

All this is very well; but it does not appear to stances, however, more than this is asked. of the relations between the bench and the bar, Four persons were severely injured last has led to some of the projudices against the evening at the Hotel Gurni by the explosion of First.—It has been said, we know not how many times, that a lawyer is not at liberty to refuse any one his services, and that when ongaged he may properly do all he can for his clent. The great English moralist took tinground and supported it by an ingenious bu n imperfect argument. Lord Brougham has even gone so far as to say, in a speech in the English House of Lords, within a year or two that the advocate is bound to carry his zend for his client so far, as to forget that there any other person in the world besides him and to lose sight of every other consideration thant the one of his success.

Now to our view a more revolting doctrie

scarcely ever fell from any man's lips. We think it unsound in theory and permetous in practice. It assumes that a man has a right t whatever the law will give him, that the lay itself is so clear that it cannot be mistaken or perverted, and that he may rightfully avail him self of every detect in an adversary's proof which the rules of evidence, or accident, or time, may which is without foundation. Let us look at this more closely. Suppose that one's client lay: claim to a tract of land, in the possession and apparent township of another, whose evidence of title, however, has been destroyed by some accident. He knows from confidential communications, made to him as counsel, that his client has not a just claim to the land; but from defect of $000 proof on the part of the possessor, it is easy for him to recover it. If the client asks it, is he bound to assist him? Few persons will go so far as that. But if the doctrine is a sound one, does it not embrace this case? There is, as it strikes us, no middle path. If the advocate is to overloon the moral aspects of the claim, he must recover this property for his client. Putting so extreme a case tests the principle, and shows it to be unsound, by showing that it leads to a consequence

The law, moreover, is not so clear and precise but that it may be mistaken or perverted. A strong mind at the bar, and a weak one on the bench, lead but too often to erroneous judgment: by which honest causes fail, and good men suffer. The argument we are combating takes for granted the infallibility of judges, and the cer-

If it be said that it is the duty of an advocatto go no further than to present the case of his client truly, leaving the result to the courts and juries, we answer, that truth is absolute, not relative. To present a case truly requires the whole truth on both sides, as well that which makeagainst, as that which makes for a client. If he presents the favorable circumstances, and sup-presees the unfavorable, does he present the cas-truly? Does he not rather impose a false imsion on those who have to judge?

pression on those who have to judge?

What would be thought of one who should offer his services to clients to teach indifferently any doctrine in government, in morals or in political economy, or to advocate any side of a historical question? Take for example the disputed facts in the life of Calvin! Suppose one should offer to take either side as his chent might choose. He would be thought a knave or a madman. Correspondence of Livingston & Co's Express, No. 2 Wall-st Why? Because sincerity is an essential element in a Christian or civilized society, and because indifference to truth is the state of mind most dangerous and detestable.

Let us not be misunders ood. We by no means assert that an advocate may not take upon himself the defence of a man whom he knows to be guilty. He may. He may not undertake to show him to be innocent; but he may undertake to show the circumstances of his case; to present the palitating circumstances of temptation. or of provocation, or anything else, that may spects of causes is greatly exaggerated. In our wn observation, we have not discovered any maintains for the whole profession. But there are instances of it undoubtedly. Brougham's speech is itself evidence enough of that—" For get that there is any other person in the worl than his client." What a monstrous declaration sacrifice everything, every relation, every consideration, to save his client! Forget that there is a society whose welfare the advocate is bound by the highest sanctions to promote; that there are other parties, whose interests are at stake, that there are duties to society, to every member of it, as well as to the one who has retained his conscience or his memory !

The comprehensive answer to the maxim wa conceive to be, that the law and all its machinery are means, not ends; that the purpose of the lawyer, we do not perceive them, and less than creation is justice; and therefore he who in his these, we cannot think will satisfy the just de. | zeal for the maintenance of the means, forgets mands of society. When a lawyer is asked for the end, betrays not only an unsound heart, but

His position as a fection of those qualities which he rightly regards legal adviser does not exempt him from the moral as essential to the character and reputation of the duties which bind other men. He has no more Bar. For the individual Lawyer obtains immeright than any other friend to advise what is diate business and recompense, not according to must judge for himself of the moral quality of his integrity as a man but his adroitness and his own actions, and if he desires no more than success as an advocate. The client does not into know what course the law requires under par- quire for the Lawyer who has most honesty ticular circumstances, the adviser's duty enes but most success-not for him who will most with explaining that. But in practice the client frequently expects and asks more. He asks advice from a friend who knows what his legal bly gain his case. And, suppose a young attorbly gain his case. In such circ coed in settling all quarrels therein, present and cumstances, he is bound by moral laws, more prospective, inducing all the members of the com potent than any human will, to throw his influence into the scale of probity. To assent to the bad scheme of an unjust client is to become equally guilty with him, and the two are as much starved himself. Before ordinary tribunals, a great deal more depends on the advocate than most men are aware of. Truth is sometimes difficult to find. There are advocates who "Could make the worse appear he better region, to perpiet and dash Maturest counsels."

Is it lawful to use this power to sustain a bad cause, or in the defence of the guilty, or what is more dreadful, in the prosecution of innocence? If it be man's law, is it God's will that noble faculties should be perverted, and learning abused, to make false reasons seem true, to cover up weak points, to give undue prominence to some facts, to villy an adversary's? The notion proceeds upon the fallacy that truth and right cannot be misrepresented or concealed. Who does not know the contrary? Who does not know the contrary? Who does not know the contrary?
